'Most man-made disasters and violent conflicts are preceded by incubation periods during which policy makers misinterpret, are ignorant of, or flat-out ignore repeated indications of impending danger' - (Boin & t'Hart, 2003:547)

In the modern world, security and risk managers can no longer claim that they are in control of factors such as terrorism, climate change, social and political instability, natural disasters, technological breakdown, supply chain failures or any of the other rapidly cascading threats that could cause disruption, and potentially catastrophic destruction, to their operations.

For most security managers, genuine crises are events that they are likely to encounter no more than once or twice in their careers. It is at such moments that lessons learned over years of experience come into play. This course will prepare crisis managers to deal with such events as professionally and effectively as possible, and in so doing, will ensure the greatest safety for their organisations, operations and personnel'

This course has been designed for experienced security, risk and crisis managers who are being tasked with the planning and management of increasingly complex scenarios.

Course Organizers

- To add value to your own personal and professional development.
- To inspire you to continue with further training.

Who Should Attend

This course is designed for experienced security, risk and crisis managers who are working in large organisations, and who are being given increasing responsibility for issues such as strategic risk policy, business continuity planning, crisis management, training and exercising and other 'softer' issues such as resilience and capability development.

Course Outline

For modern security managers, the world is very different from that we were used to ten or twenty years ago. One of the most fundamental differences is the complexity of the risk environment that we are operating in, and it is that complexity that leads to the crisis scenarios that we are faced with today. For the modern corporation, every aspect of their operation is based on a highly- interconnected network of sub-operations, the failure of anyone which could be the trigger for a major, and potentially catastrophic, corporate failure.

The nature of outside events – natural disasters, climactic changes, terrorism, political instability or supply chain collapse to name but a few, pose challenges that few security managers have actually been prepared for. Whilst each crisis is unique in itself, the challenges they create are highly predictable, and it is the creation of a robust and resilient crisis management capability based on effective planning and management that differentiates those organisations that are able to survive and recover from crisis events, and those organisations that are actually inherently unprepared, and are likely to fail at the earliest stage of any crisis situation.
